If you liked Making A Murderer, you must read Framed With Google Maps.

This true story takes place in an upper class neighborhood of Cary, North Carolina. Thirty-four-year-old Nancy Cooper, mother to two young girls, was found dead in a drainage pond three miles from her home. A fractured hyoid indicated she had likely been strangled. News of the murder shocked the “safe-town” community.

Police felt pressured to solve the case as quickly as possible . . . naturally they looked at Nancy’s husband, Brad Cooper, but when no evidence of his involvement surfaced, the investigation became dishonest. In a classic case of tunnel vision, police seemed intent to do anything necessary to ensure an indictment against Brad. They wiped all data from Nancy’s cell phone and claimed it was an accident -- did it contain exculpatory evidence? They molded witness statements so they would support their theory -- statements evolved over time. They ignored key evidence from the scene that excluded Brad, rather than trying to determine who was there with Nancy. They ignored alternate suspects – even those who Nancy had been intimately involved with. There's much more.

A Google map search of the location of the body -- alleged to have occurred before the body was found would ultimately seal Brad’s fate . . . but did he do the search? Learn how a corrupt investigation and unconstitutional legal maneuvers were used to win a case. The startling reality is that anyone can be convicted of a crime -- with or without evidence.
