Not illustrated. 1840 Excerpt: ...idol of his mother, had married, early in life, so much against her approbation that she would never acknowledge his wife. The marriage was not fortunate; the Princess Anne lived on one of her husband's estates in the country, and they corresponded constantly, though separated for many years.. In the round of amusements which I have attempted to describe, the winter glided rapidly away, and in spring we returned to Troitskoe. During that summer we made a journey into Poland, where the princess had an estate, situated near Mohilof. Few incidents worth notice occurred in this excursion, I will therefore pass it over in silence. We reached Troitskoe before autumn had set in, and again established ourselves there in our old habits. Many traits of the dear princess recur to my memory as I write. Her love for every trifle to which affection or sentiment gave a value was quite remarkable; and any such, however insignificant, together with the most rare and costly things she possessed, were treasured up in cases which she always kept in her bed-room. When any one of these cases was opened, the mixture which appeared was very amusing. Medals, gems, smelling-bottles, antiques, cameos, snuff-boxes, an English thimble and sixpence, (which ranked high in her estimation,) miniatures, and souvenirs of various kinds, which she produced from them, gave rise to many curious and interesting communications. She presented me with several things, which are endeared to me by her manner, and by little stories attached to them. On one occasion, her magnificent present was an opal which had belonged to Christina, Queen of Sweden, who gave it to one of her ministers, and whose son exchanged it with Count Panin for a diamond of equal size: he gave it to the princess to add to he...
