EXCERPT

“I… yes.” I said, scrunching my face, trying to concentrate. Now that the magic had been broken, it seemed as though the wine had hit me all at once. The train seemed to eclipse my attention, and I had a hard time concentrating on anything else. No one had ever told me, and I had never noticed before, just how soothing a sound the clatter of wheels on track could be.

The conversation faltered for a moment, and I thought perhaps I had lost my opportunity- or his attention. Still, he was a good conversationalist, and I took the time to compose myself while I waited for him to put the conversation on another direction. The cha-chunk, cha-chunk of the wheels on the tracks was omnipresent now, a mesmerizing sound that seemed to permeate me, envelop me in their quiet, hypnotic metronome even as the low buzz of the train thrummed through the darkness outside.

He said something to me just then, but I couldn’t even hear him. I was lost in the rattle of the train on the tracks, the steel on steel, and I felt my eyes slowly lower on themselves as I drifted away into the dreamy darkness outside of the window.
