Into The Twilight: the true origin of Abe Lincoln Annis Ward Jackson
INTO THE TWILIGHT is based on a story mostly ignored and/or suppressed by generations of biographers of our 16th president, Abraham Lincoln.

"The first and fundamental law of history is that it should neither dare to say anything that is false, nor fear to say anything that is true . . ." Cicero

In the memoirs of the late Harold Ickes, secretary of the interior during the FDR administration, he relates a conversation he heard between Roosevelt and the Librarian of Congress about a private collection of Lincoln's papers and letters that had been offered for sale.

"Mr. President," the librarian said, "if these letters are purchased they will become public property and will prove beyond doubt that Lincoln was an illegitimate. Shall we decline to purchase the collection or shall we purchase it and suppress or destroy those papers relating to Lincoln's paternity?"

To this Ickes quoted Roosevelt as replying, "Purchase the collection and destroy nothing! Whether or not Lincoln was an illegitimate has nothing to do with his greatness!"

Into The Twilight: The True Origins of Abe Lincoln is a dramatization of a story that has existed in the small town of Bostic in the mountains of western North Carolina since Lincoln's birth.

The story says that Lincoln was the son of a wealthy and respected farmer/magistrate, Abraham Enloe, who took Nancy Hanks into his home as a bondservant and later became the father of her child. Enloe was determined that his child would not come into the world as illegitimate so he paid Thomas Lincoln to marry Nancy and take her to Kentucky, far away from Enloe's wife and family.

Since his first foray into politics, theories have abounded about where Abraham Lincoln was actually born . Attempts to prove he was born in Kentucky were thwarted when no record of his birth could be found. The designated birthplace in Kentucky was chosen because a minute record turned up of Thomas Lincoln having worked in the area as a carpenter's helper.

A museum devoted to this subject has been established in Bostic, North Carolina.
